We live in a time of increasingly complex social realities. Violent extremism takes ever-changing forms. We are often ill-equipped to respond effectively or creatively. Towards an Inclusive Peace is a three-year programme for peacebuilders rather than a security-centred response to violent extremism. Participants from international governments, NGOs and development aid agencies discuss transformation and receive training in peacebuilding tools.

How can acknowledging and repairing the harm help restore the communities and individuals who have suffered extremism?

In 2018, Towards an Inclusive Peace will discuss restorative justice as a means to redress the harm done by violent extremism while still listening to perpetrators and victims. The event will explore how to care for the needs of victims/survivors and reintegrate those who have been radicalized and are either being prosecuted or returning voluntarily. It will include dialogue, tools of restorative justice, and narrative analysis with practitioners.

Who is this event for?

We convene a broad range of participants working in peacebuilding and development, at local, national and international governments, NGOs, and civil society organizations. Attendees will include trainers, mediators, conflict researchers, individual peacebuilders and others who have a desire to learn more about the issue and to explore practical tools to address it.

What past participants say

“This event provided a valuable and important platform where practitioners could share knowledge and information on how to tackle the crucial global issue of violent extremism in the context of the present worldwide crisis.”

Micheline Safi Ngongo, UK
A great initiative. Delivers. It is up to its mandate.
